Mrs. Kendal is thoroughly commonplace in every respect and utterly destitute of genuine dramatic ability. Her long experience gives her a certain command of "stage business," but the moment her part requires any force or real feeling, she is a complete failure. Her idea of dramatic power is to throw her head back, open her mouth wide and roll up her eyes. This is her repertoire, and go beyond it she cannot. There are actresses in America who are so infinitely her superior that it seems absurd to compare them. (Georgie Gayvan and Agnes Booth for example, Fanny Davenport and Modjeska, yet two of these artists are in companies, and it is very doubtful if any of them could draw as well as these importations. Mr. Kendal has much more ability than his wife, but he would be only a stock actor in the Lyceum or Madison Square companies, "The Squire," the piece now at the Fifth Avenue, is a strong, good play and in competent hands would be very effective. It is a most economical affair—the scenery and costumes are of the plainest description, and Mrs. Kendal's dresses are in true English taste, that is to say, bad. The support is admirable, much better than the two central figures.
